Content:

There are a range of non-drug treatments available that can help someone to live well with dementia. These include information, advice, support, therapies and activities. The GP, memory service or local Alzheimer's Society are good places to start for more information on what is available. Support for the person and their carer should be available after a diagnosis. This should give them the chance to talk things over with a professional, ask questions about the diagnosis, and think about the future. It's also important to get information on planning ahead, where to get help with this and how to stay well, both physically and mentally. Other types of treatment include the following:

- Talking therapies, such as counselling, can help someone come to terms with their diagnosis or discuss their feelings.
- Cognitive behavioural therapy (CBT) may be offered if the person develops depression or anxiety.
- Cognitive stimulation therapy is a popular way to help keep someone's mind active. It involves doing themed activity sessions over several weeks.
- Cognitive rehabilitation can enable an individual to retain skills and cope better. There is also lots that can be done at home to help someone with dementia remain independent and live well with memory loss. Support ranges from devices such as pill boxes or calendar docks to practical tips on how to develop routines or break tasks into simpler steps.
- Many people with dementia enjoy life story work, in which the person is encouraged to share their life experiences and memories. As a person's dementia progresses, they may also enjoy reminiscence work. Such activities may help improve someone's mood, wellbeing and mental abilities.
- Other popular activities include music, singing or art. It is vital that people with dementia stay as active as they can – physically, mentally and socially. Taking part in meaningful activities is enjoyable and leads to increased confidence and self-esteem.
